THE END

Somethin's Batty

Matty Mouse watched with jealous eyes as his cousin Bart Bat soared gracefully through the late afternoon sky.

"Gosh, if only I could fly," Matty thought to himself. "It's not fair that Bart has wings and I haven't. What fun I could have flying around!"

Bart Bat seemed to sense what Matty was thinking, and he floated gently down to the ground beside his cousin.

"Now, look Matty", said Bart, "I know exactly what's on your mind. I can tell from that annoyed look on your face that you're wishing you had wings like I have so you'll be able to fly. Am I right?"

"Wel-l-l", drawled Matty Mouse, "I have to admit you're close. Flying is something I've always wanted to do — and someday I will fly. You wait and see."

"But, Matty", argued Bart, "you know very well that mice can't fly, so why do you keep on aggravating yourself? As a matter of fact, I'm a little disappointed that I can't run as fast as you do, but I don't carry on about it. Why don't you just try to forget about flying?"

"I can't and won't forget," Matty replied, and the stubbborn little mouse turned and dashed toward his home. As he scampered throughout the forest, Matty met Soapy Squirrel and Timmy Turtle, who, like Bart, were always trying to discourage him from his foolish dreams of flying.

"Well, if it isn't the Junior Air Cadet," teased Soapy Squirrel.

"Where in the world are you 'flying' to?" added Timmy. "You must be in a terrible hurry."

Matty tried his best to ignore their remarks, but the words "Junior Air Cadet" and "flying" (the way Timmy used it) kept ringing in his ears. "I'll show those smart alecs", Matty fumed, as he entered the front door of his house.

One look at their son Matty's face told Mr. Mouse that he was angry about something — and there was little doubt in their minds that it had something to do with Matty's burning desire to fly.

"Something wrong, son?" Mr. Mouse asked, almost knowing what the answer would be.

"Ah, it's the same old thing," Matty answered. "Bart and a couple of my so- called friends have been teasing me — and just because I told them some day I would fly."

"But, Matty", Mrs. Mouse interrupted, how many times have father and I told you that mice just can't fly — they weren't meant to. Now you put these silly ideas from your head this instant and go down to the cellar and work on your stamp collection."

Sulkingly, Matty ambled down the stairs that led to the cellar. He looked over at his hobby table — and the stamp collection —but couldn't get up the interest to even lick one stamp. Suddenly, an idea hit Matty! The idea grew in his mind, and soon he found himself dashing about the cellar.

Matty cut some thin strong pieces from the fire wood he found and nailed them together in a sort of criss-cross pattern. He made two of these criss-cross frames, then covered them both with strips from an old burlap bag. He couldn't find any strong glue, so he had to use paste from his stamp-collecting kit to hold the burlap onto the wooden frames. When he was finished, Matty had two wing-like objects — which he promptly fastened to his front legs with some pieces of rope.

"Ha!" the little mouse proudly exclaimed, as he examined his finished product, "this ought to do the trick."

And, without wasting a second more, Matty Mouse kicked open the outside cellar doors with his hind legs. Getting a running start, he flapped his home-made "wings" — and waited for something to happen. To his surprise, he began to leave the ground. Matty flapped his arms harder — and sure enough, he rose higher into the air. After a little experimenting, he found he could control his altitude and even steer. Yes, Matty Mouse was actually flying!

The noise of the cellar doors slamming open had caused Matty's parents to come out of the house. When they saw their little son swooping down at them, the shock was almost too great.

"What do you think you're doing up there, you foolish mouse? shouted Matty's father. "Come down before you kill yourself."

"Please, Matty, come down", begged Mrs. Mouse.

But Matty Mouse ignored their pleas and continued flying about, having the time of his life.

"Don't worry about me, folks," he called down to his perplexed parents, " I can take care of myself." And the air-borne mouse zoomed off.

As Matty flew over the forest, he spied Soapy Squirrel down below busily cracking a walnut. Just as Soapy was about to pop the tempting morsel into his mouth, Matty swooped down and snatched the walnut away.

"Who said I couldn't fly?" Matty shouted playfully at the dumbfounded little squirrel. Soapy seemed dazed. All he could do was stare open-mouthed as he watched his friend disappear into the sky.

Now Matty zoomed toward the cave where his cousin Bart Bat made his home. He was very anxious to show Bart that he was now able to fly, and hoped Bart would go flying with him. When Matty arrived at the cave, however, he found his cousin hanging upside down from the ceiling — fast asleep. He didn't realize that Bart always slept in the daytime, coming out to play only after the sun went down.

"Wake up, Bart," Matty pleaded, as he flew around his slumbering relative. "Look, I can fly."

Bart opened his eyes sleepily, then snapped them wide open when he saw who it was.

"I can't believe it!" the surprised bat blurted out. "You really are flying!" Then he realized that it just wasn't right for a mouse to fly and added, "Matty, you'd better be mighty careful with that contraption. You're liable to hurt yourself."

"Nah," Matty replied, "it's as safe as can be. Come on and fly with me."

"I'm sorry", Bart said, "I can't right now. Have to get my sleep, you know". And he shut his eyes and folded his wings around him.

Matty saw there was no point in arguing with Bart, so he flew out of the cave and headed toward Chester Cat's house. As he neared the house, he saw Chester snoozing in the front yard and decided to have a little fun with him. Matty picked some acorns from the branches of a nearby oak tree, and then proceeded to drop them, one by one, on the sleeping cat's head. Chester awoke with a start — and was furious, especially when he saw who his tormentor was. But there wasn't much the poor cat could do. Matty could fly much faster than Chester could run — and so the acorn barrage kept up for several minutes.

While Matty was teasing Chester Cat, he didn't notice the rain drops falling around him — thus, he certainly didn't notice that the drops were slowly causing the paste that held his "wings" together to dissolve. He just kept on swooping after Chester, pummeling the cat with acorns.

Meanwhile, back in the cave, Bart Bat was having trouble falling asleep. He was worried about Matty getting into trouble and decided to go outside and see what he was up to. And it was a good thing for Matty that he did. For, no sooner did Bart soar out of the cave than he heard shrill screaming coming from the direction of Chester Cat's house. He recognized Matty's voice and lost no time in getting over there — and just in time, too. The rain was coming down harder now, and Matty's homemade wings were falling apart as the paste that held them fast dissolved. Just as Matty came tumbling to earth, Bart Bat swooped down and saved him from the clutches of the frustrated Chester Cat.

As the two cousins flew toward Matty's house, not a word was said at first. Finally, Matty Mouse broke the silence — and with just two words: "Never again!"

— THE END —
